Human cerebral cortex was examined for glial fibrillary acidic protein in Paget's disease of bone. Glial fibrillary acidic protein occurred throughout the cortex but was particularly prominent in the choroid plexus, hippocampus, and corpus callosum. Interrelationships of this protein with the rough-surfaced endoplasmic reticulum and nerve cells were investigated by indirect immunofluorescence and electron microscopy using monoclonal antibodies produced against rat brain glial fibrillary acidic protein. Two distinct relationships between glial fibrillary acidic protein and rough-surfaced endoplasmic reticulum were observed: 1) a physical relationship at which extensive areas of endoplasmic reticulum were strongly immunostained, and 2) an association in which only weakly immunostained areas of endoplasmic reticulum abutted on strong immunostained areas. Double immunofluorescent staining with antisera against glial fibrillary acidic protein and basic fibroblast growth factor and with anti-Paget's disease of bone monoclonal antibody revealed a close colocalization of basic fibroblast growth factor with glial fibrillary acidic protein in neuronal perikarya and endosomes. In addition, the close association between the basic fibroblast growth factor and antiserum against glial fibrillary acidic protein was demonstrated by electron microscopy. The findings support the suggestion that glial fibrillary acidic protein may be a component of the perikaryal cytoplasm, as well as a storage form of basic fibroblast growth factor. They also raise the possibility that the accumulation of the protein in Paget's disease of bone may represent a phenomenon of detoxification, analogous to the accumulation of peroxisomal enzymes in certain hepatic diseases. 245 Ga. 400 (1980) 264 S.E.2d 829 THOMPSON v.
